EXTREME GOLF

4.1.

Every March golfers from across the world come to Uummannaq, Greenland, 600 km north of the Arctic Circle for the World Ice Golf Championship. From December through to May, the fjord leading into Uummannaq is covered by a metre-thick sheet of ice and becomes an extraordinary golf course far in the north.

4.2.

The World Ice Golf Championship is usually held in March, but it doesn't take place every year. Extremely cold weather and heavy snow have made the organizers cancel it several times and sometimes even for a few years in a row.

4.3.

Ice golf is similar to regular golf but not exactly the same. The ice golf course is about 5-7% shorter than a normal golf course and there are 36 holes as compared to 18 in regular golf. The holes are a little larger, and the ball is orange, which helps you see it on the snow and ice. Other than that, ice golf is played just like traditional golf.

4.4.
------	--

One interesting thing about this extreme golf competition is that it doesn't make sense to keep records and compare them from year to year because the course looks different every time the Championship takes place. The ice moves and every year new layers appear on the surface of the course.

4.5.
------	--

The World Ice Golf Tournament was first held in 1999 and was started by a local hotel manager, Arnie Niemann. He had never played golf but had seen it on TV and thought it would be fun to have a golf course close to the hotel.

4.6.

When the World Championship is held, the average temperature is -13.9°C , and it can drop to as low as -25°C . However, because the climate is dry and the sun shines brightly, it feels warmer than it really is.

4.7.
------	--

Playing golf in sub-zero temperatures requires several layers of thermal clothing, so wrap up well. There is also a risk of being blinded by the surrounding snow and sunlight. A pair of good sunglasses is highly recommended.

GRANDMAS ARE THE BEST CHEFS

Even the best restaurants can't come close to the quality of grandma's cooking, right? This idea inspired Jody Scaravella, the owner of a New York restaurant. At Enoteca Maria he first employed a small group of Italian women. To find them, he placed an advertisement in an Italian newspaper published in New York. The ad called for "Italian housewives to cook regional dishes". When his restaurant became successful, he decided to introduce foods from different countries and employed grandmothers from all corners of the world to cook there. Now, 30 women work in this unique restaurant. There is also one grandpa from Calabria, who makes delicious pasta.

Of course, when there are so many talented cooks in one kitchen, there are also some problems. Each of these grandmothers thinks she knows better than the boss, so it's difficult for Jody Scaravella to manage such a group of individuals. However, he doesn't complain because, all in all, they accept that he is in charge and makes all the final decisions.

The restaurant attracts customers from around the world. They're coming to get a home-cooked meal and taste the grandmas' cooking. People say that in this place they remember their own grandmothers and the food they prepared. The restaurant has great reviews, and most people who have tried the grandmas' meals come back to this place again and again. There are also many customers who applaud the cooks. They get standing ovations almost every day.

WHEN SUMMER COMES

That morning Stephen noticed a few grey hairs. Many men would do something about it – for example, dye their hair, but he decided to leave it the way it was. In fact, he enjoyed the idea of having grey hairs as he thought it made him look more serious and experienced. What troubled him was that his face showed signs of stress and worry.

Stephen left the flat just before seven. He had set off for work earlier than usual that morning because he wanted to avoid the rush hour, but it seemed as if everyone else had had the same idea. Now they were all stuck in the traffic. What's more, there had been an accident half way along Sussex Gardens. Everyone was waiting impatiently for the police to arrive and sort out the chaos. By the time the situation was back to normal, he was late for work and not in a very good mood.

He locked the Saab and went into the comfortably cool building, which was a relief on the hottest days of the summer. The offices of Jardine and Makepeace, advertising agents, for whom Stephen worked, were on the fourteenth floor of a modern block, the only one in the area, with wonderful views over Regent's Park. But that morning, when Stephen found himself climbing the stairs (the lift was out of order!), he would happily have given up the views for an office on the ground floor.

"Please let everything go smoothly today," he said to himself as he made his way up the stairs. Stephen was worried about work – the agency had lost an important client that week. He felt that Charlie Jardine, the agency's boss, thought Stephen was responsible for it. A couple of days earlier, as he was passing by Charlie's office, he heard him saying on the phone, "Yes, well, I'll have to talk to Stephen about that. He was the one working on their new advertisement." Stephen hadn't heard any more but he thought that Charlie had sounded a bit angry.

It definitely wasn't a good time to go on holiday – his job might disappear while he was away. But he didn't want to miss this break – and in any case, his wife, Anna, would kill him if he mentioned cancelling the trip they'd already booked. So he said nothing to her about his worries. He often found it hard to talk to her about his problems at work.

As Stephen was about to leave work that evening, Charlie Jardine called him into his office and told him that times were hard and one member of the staff would have to go. Then Charlie said, "But of course, I don't want to lose you." Why didn't that make Stephen feel better? He left work with a heavy heart.
