TOUCHDOWN IN TIBET

The descent over the Tsangpo valley is slightly unnerving for the first time. I could feel that the plane was slowly descending, but below there was no trace of any city or airport, not even a single house. The plane did not circle or turn in any way but just continued to sink lower and lower in the morning sky. The mountain tops appeared very close outside the windows. Some were even above the plane. The inquisitive mind can stretch the minutes of the descent into long hours. “Was the pilot really the uniformed youth we saw slurping tea from a jam jar at the top of the steps? Had he been in a plane before? Did the man with the screwdriver do his job?”

Suddenly, as if in answer to the prayers being said aboard the plane, a flash of grey concrete appeared at the moment of impact and the plane rolled securely along one of the longest runways in Asia. The relief of a safe landing is normally missed by the foreign passengers who instead watch in disbelief at the sight of Tibetans happily standing in the aisle at this tense moment, stretching, yawning and unpacking their belongings from the overhead lockers. The flight attendants do not react.

I once sat on the plane to Lhasa with an American visitor who suddenly screamed at the top of her voice, ‘SIT DOWN! EVERYBODY SIT DOWN!’ All heads turned to this frantic woman who was waving madly at the Tibetans to get back in their seats. Rather sheepishly, those standing in the aisle, looked at one another, then back to the wild woman and decided that there would be less trouble if they just stood by their seats and waited until the plane had landed before continuing to empty the overhead locker. As soon as the door opened, heavy parcels of stinking garlic grass and cabbage were dropped from overhead lockers and the Tibetans made their way to the front, flattening everything in their path. Once on the runway, they scurried off towards the airport building dragging their bundles behind them.

When I got off, I was left in peace to survey the scene around me. The sky directly above was an impossibly bright blue that I had only seen before on faked postcards. Woolly clouds hung in the air just over the mountain tops. At first, I was slightly disappointed. I had expected the landing strip to be hacked out of ice between glaciers, but here everything looked soft and green. I didn’t realise at the time that I was seeing Tibet at the climax of its short, warm summer and that, just two months later, I would be desperate to see something green – other than the fluorescent Holiday Inn sign covered with snow. Intrigued though I was with all this, I set about the more immediate task of finding my car and driver.

I had only walked 20 paces across the runway when I had to stop to take in lung-full of air. I was gasping like a fish on the river bank. After a few moments to regain my breath, I headed for the airport building. Stepping over a ditch which ran along the side of the runway, a young man approached me waving a white cloth.

“Holiday Inn?” he smiled.

I nodded and returned the smile.

“Ah, I am Tashi,” he said, busy searching for something in his bag which turned out to be a beautiful silk scarf that he gave me as a present. Still smiling, he placed the scarf over my head, bowed slightly and uttered the words tashi delai.

“Good to meet you Tashi Delai. I am Alec Le Sueur.”

“No, no, I am not Tashi Delai. I am Tashi.”

“So who is Tashi Delai?” I asked. He looked puzzled and said “Nobody is Tashi Delai.”

This conversation was getting us nowhere.

“Tashi delai is a Tibetan greeting,” he explained. “My name is Tashi. Only Tashi. Not Tashi Delai.”

“Ah, I see,” I said.

Whoever Tashi was I could see that we were going to be friends.

CLUNY'S CAGE

Charles Edward Stuart (1720–1788), commonly known as the Young Pretender, or Bonnie Prince Charlie, is an important figure in Scotland's history. He believed the British crown was his birthright and together with his Jacobite followers planned to remove the Hanoverian usurper George II from the throne. His bold attempt to achieve this, initiated in 1745, ended with the total defeat of his army at the Battle of Culloden. 8.1. _____ Bonnie Prince Charlie was one of them.

Historians from the 1745 Association have long sought to establish the whereabouts of the hideout where Bonnie Prince Charlie stayed with Cluny MacPherson, one of his closest allies, in early September 1746. Maps of the area have long marked "Prince Charlie's Cave", also called "Cluny's Cage", on the southern slopes of Ben Alder. 8.2. _____ They claim that slightly to the west of the traditional spot they have found a location which more closely matches MacPherson's description of the prince's shelter.

The vice-president of the 1745 Association commented on the discovery saying that it cannot be claimed with any certainty that it is the real site of "Cluny's Cage", but it is a reasonable candidate. 8.3. _____ And the two large rocks found there must indeed have formed a perfect fireplace from which there was a natural chimney. Besides, smaller stones at the site appear to be blackened on the underside, suggesting a fire may have been lit there. The new location fits MacPherson's description almost entirely. 8.4. _____ Yet, it follows from various accounts that there were some in this area during the mid-18th century. The Association will now consider what further research or archaeological work may be possible and affordable in order to establish this claim beyond doubt.

adapted from www.scotsman.com

- A. The spot is said to have been chosen by the fugitives because smoke from cooking could disappear up the cliff face without being noticed.
- B. His accomplice, Cluny MacPherson, made an attempt to overthrow the king, but failed and had to flee and hide.
- C. The Jacobites who survived the bloodshed had to run for their lives, and often spent months in hiding.
- D. The only thing that is not in keeping with it is the fact that there are no trees at the site of the supposed hideout.
- E. However, some members of the organisation have doubts whether it is the true site of the hideout.
