TOAD-IN-THE-HOLE

A. British cuisine is rich in culinary delicacies with strange names, for instance: bubble and squeak, pigs in blankets, angels on horseback. They are all part of Britain's cultural heritage. A dish with a particularly striking name is Toad-in-the-Hole. It is made of pork sausages baked in crispy batter and served with gravy. The sausages resemble toads peeking out of gaps in the batter. The dish dates back to the 18th century. But, shockingly enough, in a recent survey almost 16% of respondents in their 20s were sure this British classic contains an actual toad.

B. It is widely accepted that the dish was originally developed by lower-income families. During the Industrial Revolution, working conditions were harsh and the pay workers received was poor. At a time when meat was pricey, British families had to search for more affordable and filling ingredients in order to feed themselves at minimum expense. It was at this time that a great number of families discovered that combining a flour-based batter with inexpensive cuts of meat and a hot, filling gravy was an ideal combination for economical meals. Toad-in-the-Hole is a perfect example of this.

C. The etymology of the puzzling name of the dish has always been a source of debate. There is even a bizarre toad-related tale of doubtful authenticity connected with the dish. The story goes like this: in Alnmouth, a village in North East England, a local golf course was overrun with toads. During a golf tournament, a toad pushed a golf player's ball out of the 18th hole using its head. This resulted in the player's consternation and the laughter of the group of onlookers. The chef at the local hotel supposedly came up with a dish to commemorate this humorous moment by baking sausages in batter so that they looked like toads poking their heads out of golf holes.

THE FLATIRON – A NEW YORK ICON

One of the symbols of New York City is a very peculiar triangular-shaped building in Manhattan.

Designed by Daniel Burnham, an American architect and urban designer, it was originally owned by the Fuller Company, a major construction firm, and served for many years as the company's headquarters. Today, it mainly houses publishing businesses, as well as a few shops on the ground floor.

It was, unsurprisingly, called the Fuller Building when it opened in 1902.

5.1. ____ Instead, the first steel-framed skyscraper in the city became known as the Flatiron. Although the building does resemble an old-fashioned clothes iron, it is often said that the name was actually inspired by the triangular piece of land on which the building was constructed, already called the Flatiron.

Daniel Burnham made the most of the available space. 5.2. ____ Investors were not discouraged though, and the construction of the building was completed on schedule. At 22 stories and 307 feet, the Flatiron was never the city's tallest building, but always one of its most dramatic-looking.

At the beginning of the 20th century considerable efforts were being made to modernize New York City's business districts. 5.3. ____ Whereas many of the nearby structures featured high towers emerging from heavy, block-like bases, Burnham's skyscraper rose directly up from street level, making a striking contrast against the lower buildings nearby. Apart from its shape, the thinness of the Flatiron also drew attention. These two characteristics of the building initially led to widespread doubts about its structural stability. These concerns were raised by experts who believed, wrongly as it turned out, that the combination of the building's distinctive features and height would make it prone to collapse.

Also, newspaper report authors complained about the potentially dangerous wind tunnel effect created by the building. A striking visual reference to this phenomenon can be found at the subway station near the Flatiron. 5.4. ____ They are at varying distances from the ground, reflecting the different heights of the individuals who would have had them on their heads decades ago. Thus today's passengers are warned to prepare for the gusts of wind that will hit them once they emerge onto the street.

- A. And the Flatiron's innovative design certainly suited that trend as the building, shaped like a perfect right triangle, was revolutionary in its own way.
- B. Moreover, its popularity with photographers and artists has made it an enduring symbol of New York for more than a century.
- C. His distinctive skyscraper filled this difficult building plot completely, but its design caused a lot of controversy.
- D. Over a hundred mosaic hats decorate the walls inside, as a tribute to the people walking by the Flatiron in the past, whose hats would have been at risk of being blown away.
- E. Yet the name never stuck, and neither did another one – Burnham's Folly, which reflected the public's negative attitude to Burnham's design.

RUN, JESSE, RUN!

Jesse slid out of bed.

“Where are you going, Jesse?” May Belle lifted herself up from the bed.

“Shush!” He warned. He knew Momma would be mad if they woke her up.

“Just over to the cow field,” he whispered.

“Are you going to run?”

“Maybe.”

Of course he was going to run. He had gotten up early every day all summer to run. He figured that if he worked at it, he could be the fastest runner in the fifth grade. He had to be the very best.

He tiptoed out of the house. The wooden floorboards creaked loudly whenever you put your foot down firmly, but if you tiptoed, they gave only a slight squeak, and he could usually get outdoors without waking Momma, Ellie, Brenda or Joyce Ann. May Belle was another matter. She was nearly seven, and she adored him, which was OK.

Once outside the house, Jesse headed for the yard and began to run. His arms and legs flew out in all directions. He had never learned to run properly, but he was long-legged for a ten-year-old, and no one had more strength and determination than he.

Lark Creek Elementary School was short on sports equipment, so all the balls went to the upper grades during the long break after lunch. The older boys took the centre of the field for their ball games, while the girls claimed the top section for jump rope and hanging around talking. So the lower-grade boys had started running.

One time last year Jesse had won a running race. Only once. But it had given him a taste for winning. Ever since he had been in first grade he had been that “crazy little kid that draws all the time.” But one drizzly Monday he ran ahead of them all. For the rest of that day, he had been “the fastest kid in the third, fourth, and fifth grades,” and he was only a fourth grader. The next day, Wayne Pettis had won again as usual. But this year Wayne Pettis would be in the sixth grade playing football and baseball with the rest of the big guys. So anybody had a chance to be the fastest runner, and this year it was going to be Jesse!

Jesse pumped his arms harder and bent his head towards the distant fence. He could hear the third-grade boys screaming him on. They would follow him around like a country-music star. And May Belle would be thrilled. Her brother was the fastest. Even his dad would be proud. May Belle would tell Daddy, so it wouldn't look as though he, Jesse, wanted to boast. Maybe Dad would be so proud he would forget all about how tired he was from the long drive back and forth to Washington and the digging and carrying all day. He would get right down on the floor and wrestle, the way they used to. Old Dad would be surprised at how strong Jesse had become in the last couple of years.

His body was begging him to quit, but Jesse wouldn't give up.

THE BUSINESS OF RUNNING

In the spring of 1995 Brian Metzler graduated from university and began a career in sports journalism. He was also a keen amateur runner in need of some new running shoes. In order to obtain the best pair possible, he went to a specialist running store. There he was among his kind of people – runners talking about workouts, runs and the latest in sports shoe styling. Although he had other pressing financial needs, such as paying the rent for his apartment, he felt he had to buy a pair of running shoes. Not just any running shoes, but innovative ones with, for instance, impressive-looking air pockets in the heels. The price tag of $140 for such a spectacular pair was an amount he could only just afford. Metzler was willing to sacrifice the money in order to pursue his passion. However, having bought the expensive shoes he was disappointed to discover that although a lot of effort had gone into making them look good, they weren't actually very good for running in!

As a result of that purchase, it became clear to Metzler that the sports shoe industry tends to place a bigger emphasis on appearance than performance. During his subsequent career in journalism and continued involvement in amateur running this conviction only deepened and it eventually led to his 2019 book Kicksology, which was subtitled: "The Hype, Science, Culture and Cool of Running Shoes". It is a fascinating read, especially because Metzler's numerous sources in the international running shoe business enable him to give readers an insider view.

Metzler points out that in the running boom of the 1970s shoes were made to help runners race faster. But a decade later when a new generation of "hobby joggers" took up the sport, running shoe manufacturers began the trend of coolness that still continues. Running shoes are no longer about "just running". Rather, as Metzler sums it up, "they are a vehicle for self-expression, they are meant to feel good and make you feel good". But what is truly important, he adds, is that the hype, coolness and innovations don't actually matter "as long as you're running with passion".

- C. is an author of a book which gives readers insights into the world of running shoes.
- D. could easily afford to buy expensive running shoes when he started his career in journalism.

6.5. In the last paragraph, it is stated that

- A. only high quality running shoes guarantee safety.
- B. it is difficult to satisfy the tastes of present-day runners.
- C. today what matters most to amateur runners is their speed.
- D. the desire to run is more important than fashion or style.
